What are the Rules & Regulations for Internet providers failing to roll over data allowances that are unused at the end of a cycle? Typically, Verizon charges a flat rate for a certain number of GB. This block is paid for in full on a monthly basis. Even so, Verizon does not roll forward any unused portion of the data allowance to the next monthly billing cycle. When a customer pays for something and it is retracted by the vendor, this amounts to theft. What Rules & Regulations have the FCC written to address this theft? If the answer is "nothing", when will the FCC write Rules & Regulations to prevent this type of theft?
