I have a question about the security of information transmitted by mobile and wifi devices. Is the Constitutional protection of a person, papers, property, and affairs extended to the mobile transmission of said "intellectual property" in as far as it is used to track, locate or prosecute individuals not conducting acts that are defined as terrorism? And if not, what amendment grants the authority of the government to interfere with the liberty that the government does not constitutionally have to infringe upon? I am interested because I swore an oath to protect and uphold a document that seems not recognized by the government that under which was established.
